CYNTHIA CHIFFON'S CAPRICE.

N August sun was rousing the spires of the cathedral as Miss Cynthia Chiffon rattled up 5th avenue in a cab with her maid.

Miss Chiffon had run over from Narragansett, to do some shopping for Mamma.

Chiffon, who was too wheezy and fat to run anywhere this hot weather.

It was with great misgivings that Chiffon mere had seen her hope and pride depart from the pier. One of the patrician traditions inherent in the minds of those who make their millions in oil or hogs is that their young women must be chaperoned properly and as befits blue blood.

Little recked she that Miss Cynthia proposed to turn this harmless, needles-and-pins expedition into adventure. The young woman resolved to see a little life on her own account as well as to replenish mamma's boxes and trunks. In this intention she was aided and abetted by Hortense, her maid, a singular mixture of dexterity and diablerie.

There were two men at the pier who had dangled after the pretty girl all summer, but who, thanks to mamma, had had no opportunities commensurate with their respective abilities to make love to her. Miss Cynthia proposed to help them out a bit, and to that end Hortense contrived to let each man know that her young lady was to spend three or four days alone at the Chiffon town house.

Miss Chiffon had not been in her papa's palatial mansion two hours when the card of Mr. J. Townsend Tobasco, was brought up by Hortense. Fifteen minutes later Miss Chiffon had accepted Mr. Tobasco's invitation to dine with him on the following evening. Twenty minutes later Mr. Rene Risque was shown into the drawing room.

Thirty minutes, Tobasco departs with a scowl; forty-five minutes, Mr. Risque goes with Miss Chiffon's promise to dine with him on the next evening but one.

Miss Cynthia knew perfectly well that she was utterly reprehensible. What she did not realize, however, was the dangerous folly of her conduct.

"I have a caprice," said this young woman, who was pleased to speak after the fashion of a French heroine, "to see how they will act. It is high time I were in love. Now, unless symptoms fail, both these objects are in love with me. The man who proves himself an adept in love-making, who is most fearfully in earnest, stormy, savage even, I shall love. I must be carried away by the intensity of his passion. Women love to be mastered," and a lot more of this sort of rubbish which Miss Chiffon had imbibed from a certain class of literature and from whispers over a cup of tea in the boudoir of her frivolous friend, Mrs. Percy Poppycock.

On the next evening Mr. J. Townsend Tobasco rang the Chiffon bell. Mr. Tobasco was a young man of excellent social position, some money, a few brains. Though a man of pleasure, he made it his policy to conceal his dissipation. He was a vestryman of a fashionable church and by his circle was considered a paragon of respectability. He was big, brawny, dully audacious. He fancied he understood women. Especially did he flatter himself he had taken the measure of this little sylph, who in distracting summer costume fluttered into the cab with him and turned a delightfully joyous face expectantly toward him.

It was dusk. The electric lights were flashing out, one by one, Broadway, though deserted, was yet fascinating. The summer night breeze was rising.

"Just fancy!" cried Cynthia, in her jubilant, silvery voice. "Think! I have never been out like this before. What an adorable bat! By the way, where are we going to dine?"

"At a famous Italian restaurant on the East side. That will be another experience. It wouldn't do to go to Del's you know," was his answer.

"No-o," with a delicious pout, "I fancy not. But what is the name of this famous cafe?"

"She cannot possibly know," said the man to himself; then aloud carelessly, "Confetti's."

The girl's face froze disdainfully. "Tell the man to drive home at once," she said.

"I will not," he retorted savagely. "You have chosen to dine with me unchaperoned. I don't propose to have my evening spoiled by your caprices."

The blood of all the dead and gone Chiffon pork-packers burned in the girl's face, and she shook a diminutive but defiant fist right under Tobasco's patrician proboscis: "Take me home, you cad," she said, "or I'll make a scene that will ruin you in all your clubs."

Tobasco looked at the furious little face and succumbed. The butterfly, he might have crushed between his thumb and forefinger, had worsted him.

In utter silence they returned to the Chiffon house. Miss Cynthia marched in, leaving her discomfited wooer to sneak back in the cab, a hissing and a byword to the sophisticated driver who had taken in Tobasco's defeat with great glee.

"Mon Dieu, ma'amselle," stammered Hortense, "you are back already—"

"Get me a cup of tea—"

"Mais, M. Tobasco, ma'amselle," spluttered the maid, foreseeing with the passing of M. Tobasco a stringency in the money market.

"Hold your tongue!"

"Oui, ma'amselle."

"I fancy it served him right," was her sensible conclusion, "but it was odious. And Tobasco! Who ever would have dreamed he is so vile a beast? I was rather fond of him, too—quite seriously thought of loving him—good faith, expectations, unexceptionable tailor. Bahl! Ah, well, if Tobasco, the respectable, will act like that, what will Rene Risque do?"

She was
